It is part of the operating system's graphical subsystem. The mouse pointer might be displayed by the operating system or by an application. In Windows, the mouse icon is often the stick-man character. Driver a program, which is needed to control hardware components of a computer. Original Mouse a mechanical mouse which is designed to be driven by a mouse-tracking device. This type of a mouse is popular with people who are creating, publishing or drawing. The physical mouse is removed from the mouse-driver and the movement is recorded by the mouse driver. Mouse drivers include both navigation and pointing drivers, which perform different functions: In navigation drivers, the mouse driver tracks the movement of the mouse pointer, and moves the cursor on the display accordingly. In pointing drivers, the mouse driver positions the cursor, so the output of a point-and-click software can be displayed, etc. Driverless Mouse a mouse which is not driven by a mouse-driver. It operates without needing a mouse-driver. This type of a mouse can be a Bluetooth mouse or an IR mouse, which works directly with the device it is connected to. For example, an IR mouse can be used with a TV remote control. Pointer the output which an input device displays to the screen. The output is a graphic icon, which indicates the direction and the change of direction, the speed and the acceleration of motion. Precision Mouse a mouse, which has sensors that can record movements to hundredths of a millimeter. A precision mouse is very common with graphic designers, surgeons, mechanics and architects. X-Box Mouse a mouse, which is designed to be controlled by a remote control with an infrared sensor. The mouse is connected to a receiver, which is controlled by a remote control. Mouse Invert a function in graphical applications, where a mouse icon is displayed opposite to the cursor. Mouse Dock a mode in graphical applications, where the mouse icon is always positioned on the mouse side
