Read more about Opaserv (a-j) Cleaner at: report by Bloomberg says the United Kingdom is increasingly facing a shortage of children to care for its aging population. The article says that Britain's birth rate has been declining for decades and has now fallen to 1.5 children per woman. And while the British government has recently taken steps to encourage people to have more kids, the report suggests that this might not be enough. "If our nation is to enjoy a sustainable future, the fertility rate must increase," Prime Minister Theresa May reportedly said in her speech at the Conservative Party conference in 2016. "We cannot afford to wait any longer." But is there a shortfall of babies in the UK? Quinn Mulholland, a policy expert at the Institute for Public Policy Research, told Business Insider that the birth rate is still very high compared with other developed countries. According to the World Bank, Britain's birth rate is the highest in Europe, with an average of 1.89 children per woman. The European average is 1.47. Quinn Mulholland: "We still have very high birth rates. What has happened is that there is less couples having children than in the past. With the proportion of women in work on the rise, there are more people who are in a position to raise a family, but it's not necessarily a large family. For a variety of reasons, including the cost of housing, not all people want to have a large family. This is where there is a bit of a shortfall." She noted that the report warned that if the birth rate fell too much, too many children born today would become grandparents before their time, and a large percentage of the pension system would have to be funded by their kids, causing the younger generation to find themselves in trouble financially, or having to pay more in taxes. The report says that if nothing changes, the number of children born in Britain could be as low as 1.33 in 2050
