Environmental, social and economic risks and challenges are central concerns in occupational disease prevention. In this article, the authors suggest four measures to assess the risk in occupational disease prevention. These are: the probability of occurrence of the disorder, the degree to which the disorder does harm, the level of harm caused by the disorder and the cost of prevention. The authors support the need to use both the comparative and absolute risk measures in occupational disease risk assessment. In assessing a risk, it is appropriate to draw on the similar research already conducted in other areas. The authors suggest that in the future, each risk area should be reviewed annually to ensure that the risk measures are kept up to date. Finally, the authors suggest that the established risk-related reporting and communication of occupational disease prevention should be seen as a means to develop new awareness and research activity in this area.Dating a
