imagine how it might be possible to get someone to believe that the most basic laws of nature may not be true, and that space and time may not be as solid as we've been told. It's not enough to have extraordinary claims and scientific evidence to back them emphasize. A good story can convince some people of almost anything — and that was certainly true for the idea of a "new" reality, a world in which forces and subatomic particles could be moved, warped, and manipulated. The concept was around at least since the 1800s, when German physicist Hermann von Helmholtz proposed what might be called the "ether" theory, the idea that there is some sort of invisible stuff that pervades the universe. In 1887, physicist Albert Michelson demonstrated that the speed of light is always the same, regardless of the speed of the source or the speed of the observer, meaning that there's not "wobbling" about the model of the universe as we know it. But it was really a Princeton physicist named Edward Condon who, in a 1956 paper in the journal Physical Review, made it sound as though the ether theory were no longer science fiction. "They are lies that the ether is dragged along with the bodies," he wrote, "that it can change from one place to another like a fluid, that if you close your eyes you will be free of the vision of the solid sphere, which is the spatial-temporal reality." Condon's paper can
