References External links Website Facebook Category:Internet properties established in 2012On September 29, 2015, the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) voted to adopt rules that will ban all internet-based 911 calls. This vote is the culmination of many efforts to force telephone companies to turn over call records to the Federal government in times of national emergencies. The emergency alert system (EAS) is a system owned and operated by the federal government that sends out emergency alerts to televisions, cell phones and other communication systems in designated areas. Emergency Alert System (EAS) can be used for a variety of alerts, but the FCC has reserved the right to use it for the purpose of national emergencies as well as Amber Alerts. The same technology used to send out mass email messages can also be used to deliver emergency alerts in near real-time. The FCC asserts that they have the authority to use EAS because of the Communications Act of 1934. This act originally allowed the federal government to set up the radio spectrum, which was expanded as time went on to include television and now cell phones. The primary argument used by the FCC was the Communications Act of 1934's Section 254(b)(4), which allows the FCC to use its authority "with respect to the radio communication" for the promotion of safety. With the EAS Act of 2016 (H.R. 2852), Congress asserts that the FCC has the authority to use EAS for the purpose of national emergencies. The bill was introduced by Congresswoman Susan Brooks (R-IN) and was sponsored by Susan Brooks, Scott Peters, Mike Quigley, Peter Welch, Aleece Hastings and Bob Latta.
