Antibodies specific for different gangliosides inhibit the growth of a human neuroblastoma cell line heterologously expressing CD1. The basis of a therapeutic strategy is the identification of tumor-associated carbohydrate-based antigens, which can be recognized by antibodies (Ab) or selective peptide ligands. Similar to iota-tetrasialosylpyranosylceramide, GD3, CD1a, glycolipids of the major nervous system gangliosides contain alpha-linked sialic acid, a sugar which is well-characterized in terms of structure, and conserved in terms of immunogenicity among multiple human tumor entities, including neuroblastomas (NB). A panel of human (Hu) anti-ganglioside antibodies (Abs) together with a 2F5 murine Ab, directed against a common epitope on alpha-(2-->8)-linked sialic acids/GD3, were used in functional assays. The growth of the UN-NeuA human NB cell line carrying human CD1a and CD1b (scL9-17) was not influenced by these Abs under serum-free conditions. This suggests that this CD1:ganglioside complex is the cellular target of the anti-CD1 antibodies. Hu anti-GD2 and -CD1a/b Ab, which cross-inhibit each other's binding to an epitope on GD3, have additive effects in vitro. In contrast, a more complex situation is seen in vivo. The anti-GD2 or anti-GD3 Abs did not inhibit the growth of scL9-17 and the Hu neuroblastoma cell line NMB cells in athymic nude mice. Animal sera prepared before vaccination with GD2-stabilized auto-neutrophil particles were able to inhibit the growth of scL9-17 and of the NMB/GD2 NB cell line in nude mice. This is the first report that shows that Hu tumor cell lines, which are xenotransplanted and have a pseudo-self-tissue phenotype, can be eliminated or controlled by Hu antibodies and that human sera can be successfully prepared by immunization with carbohydrate antigens in mice.All-NEW, All-DIFFERENT Brake
