They stated that the results showed that the healthcare services of these elderly were not in compliance with the criteria used in the RAMQ, and that there is a need for training and guidelines for the evaluation and treatment of elderly with chronic conditions. Using the RAMQ criteria of the appropriateness of the services offered to the elderly population has been previously mentioned by Kifelis et al. in a study which aimed to establish a different criteria for evaluating the healthcare services offered to the elderly, as they do not have access to a healthcare plan for primary care and their condition is often related to more chronic illnesses \[@CR2\]. They also stated that in accordance with the RAMQ criteria of the appropriateness of services, the few elderly insured by public organizations would not be in a position to gain benefits from the appropriate healthcare services offered by the healthcare system, and therefore would have difficulties with their chronic conditions. It is worth mentioning that apart from being in a stronger position financially, the elderly insured by private organizations, may also have better access to the healthcare services that meet their needs, since they can refer to a physician of their choosing \[@CR2], \[@CR14\]. Dingley et al. \[@CR15\] found that the same population group -- elderly -- had a more optimistic outlook on their future health, access to healthcare services, and being satisfied with their health compared to younger population groups. Their study revealed a positive perception regarding the accessibility of their health services by the elderly population, however, when using the appropriateness of healthcare services to assess the elderly
