What's new:

Snowboarding is a type of skiing where a rider moves by balancing on a snowboard. The use of snowboards dates back to the early 1930s. The first snowboard, by Burton, was manufactured by Scot Thurber on February 23, 1933. It was designed for use on Lake Placid, NY, in the hope of snowboarding competitions to become an Olympic sport. Snowboarding started gaining popularity in the 1970s. Today, snowboarding is also an activity used for mountain climbing.

Terminology Snowboarding was originally known as water-skiing on snow, until the use of snowboards began to grow rapidly in the 1970s.

Types Personal A snowboard (sometimes called a snowboard) is a board generally long and about wide, sometimes with increased width in the tip and tail. The board is usually slightly narrower than normal skateboards and wider than surfboards. The difference in width from normal skateboards is usually under. Riders stand on the board with their feet positioned at the ends of the board, usually with the toes pointed to prevent "sneakiness" while turning.

Snowboard parks are common in many countries and consist of approximately fifty ramps. They are usually arranged in a circle similar to a roller coaster. Snowboarding has become more popular among teenagers and adults, and sometimes with age, can attract more men. Snowboarding is not only fast and fun, it can also be very challenging if the skill required is not mastered. Skateboarders can learn to snowboard by attaching a bumper to the back half of a traditional skateboard. This type of skateboard is generally known as a "whitewall", "hyposkate", or "hybrid". Multi-person A zipline connected two or more snowboards is sometimes called a snowboard "blanket", "tube". The original snowboarding "tube" made of polyethylene was patented in 1974 by Burton retail manager Jean Rousseau, and has been copied and used ever since.

History Early history It is claimed that snowboarding was invented at the 1933 USA Championship Snowboarders Fédération Internationale (FSI) Freestyle Championship in Lake Placid, New York. Skiing pioneer Bert Schneider (owner of ski areas) owned the property on which the Lake Placid National Games was held, and persuaded Swiss Olympic Committee officials to hold an international snowboard competition on
