Like all caranid worms these are marine hermaphroditic organisms and reproduce by cyclic parthenogenesis. Description These hermaphroditic organisms are highly variable in colour and shape. The colour ranges from pale yellow to dark brown and the bodies are rod-shaped. They have a simple stomach but most of their food is absorbed through their cuticle. Dryocosmus Dryocosmus are annual cyclic parthenogens, with a stylet, hooded and wrinkled trunk and a pair of long tentacles. The first pair of tentacles are the true tentacles with a short tip and a robust sub-terminal muscle. The second pair of tentacles is a highly modified form of tentacle and are similar to the first

This invention relates to a computer input device and more particularly to an improved keyboard having an improved electrical contact assembly. As used herein, the term high-tech includes both high technology and electronic technology. While this invention is specifically disclosed in the context of a computer keyboard, it is not intended to be so limited and may be utilized with any keyboard or other computer input device where the subject invention may be advantageously utilized. A conventional keyboard for a computer usually has a plurality of key switches which are responsive to depression by a user's finger(s) to provide a selected signal or key. The size and shape of the keys may vary and typically are in a staggered array of rows and columns. A common keyboard arrangement includes sets of digits, function and cursor keys. A key is often used to denote a leftmost cursor key or other function key. The conventional keyboard structure typically includes a molded plastic keypad having a plurality of electrical contacts or bus bars which are electrically connected to wiring. The bus bars are typically molded within the keypad. Typically, the bus bars are formed with horizontal ribs. The ribs serve to support the flexible wiring which is sandwiched between the ribs. The ribs are usually oriented parallel to the plane of a keyboard printed circuit board (PCB). The various contact elements are disposed on a substrate above or below the PCB in an electrical contact region. The contacts may be arranged in a staggered array which is determined by the footprint of the contacts. The footprint of the conventional contacts is predetermined by the layout of the device and/or the electrical characteristics of the contact material. The footprint is defined as a distance between respective contact elements and the longitudinal center of the contact element. The footprint of the contact elements is thus defined by the circumferential lengths of the contact bars which extend from the contact elements. It will be appreciated that the longer the contact bar, the greater the footprint of the contact element is. The circumferential lengths of the contact bars are defined by the distance 648931e174 favorite among educators, First Aid for Homes is a step-by-step program, that teaches the first aid basics with modern and easy-to-understand language. No prior training or previous First Aid experience is required. Be prepared for the unexpected emergency and start your course today. First Aid for Schools gives the same information to students in a realistic setting, and prepares them for life in a school environment. A popular course with students, each day covers a different topic including Head, Neck, Chest, Internal and External Injuries, Poisoning, Burns, and Cold Injuries. Students learn how to use the appropriate medical equipment, as well as how to manage emergencies at school such as cuts and scrapes, head injuries, heat emergencies and sudden cardiac arrest. First Aid for Homes, First Aid for the Workplace and First Aid for Schools are each available in DVD and book form, and are the preeminent First Aid manuals. Unfortunate, but true, sometimes First Aid, or its
