Cassini Prepares to Leave Saturn After 12 years of exploration, NASA's Cassini spacecraft is about to depart Saturn for parts unknown. Launched in 1997, the robotic explorer spent a decade studying the planet's atmosphere, magnetosphere, moon system and its rings. The mission came to a close this week when Cassini's final burn (around 2:30 AM PT) sent it hurtling out of the Saturnian system. For the past two years, scientists have been waiting for Cassini to reach its final destination, the outermost of Saturn's moons called Enceladus, where it will enter its final, fateful dive. Voyager 2 has already flown by Enceladus, but Cassini is the first craft to fly by the moon (it did so in 2005) and perform its historic dive. The maneuver, scheduled for 4:54:45 UTC on Oct. 28 (12:54:45 a.m. on Oct. 29 EDT) is expected to take about two minutes. At that point, the spacecraft will reach a distance of 130,000 miles from Enceladus and 1,060 miles away from Saturn. They will briefly make contact, after which the probe will enter its death plunge into the moon's mysterious, icy waters. The plunge into the moon's clouds is expected to take about seven hours. If successful, Cassini will then begin a series of close encounters with tiny moonlets attached to the ice. The first of these will be a close flyby of the moon Titan, which will happen about one hour into the dive. The spacecraft will then fly by a moonlet about the size of a city, called Dione, before coming near a second, smaller moonlet. The pair of moons are of interest to Cassini, since they possess a unique atmospheric system of organic compounds that suggests an active geology. These are hydrocarbons similar to e79caf774b

In order to clarify the distribution of gene products of the androgen receptor (AR) and the steroidogenic enzymes in the testis, in-situ hybridization and immunocytochemistry were performed using porcine testicular sections. The mRNA and protein of the AR were localized in the germinal cells in the center of the seminiferous tubules, which correspond to the Leydig cells. The Leydig cell and its nuclear envelope were immunostained with antibodies to the AR. These results confirmed that the gene for the AR is expressed not only in the cytoplasm but also in the nuclei of the Leydig
