The overall objective of this project is to develop and improve computational algorithms that can quickly and effectively classify objects based on their physiologically important properties. This project is designed to solve a specific bottleneck in clinical diagnostic medicine. Current practice is to perform a series of expensive and invasive tests on a patient to try to distinguish between diseases which cause the same symptoms and to classify specific diseases based on the anatomic distribution and pattern of the disease process. Although existing noninvasive computer-based imaging methods, such as computed tomography and magnetic resonance imaging, can help in this process, these methods do not, in general, provide sufficient detail or resolution to localize and predict the presence of specific types of disease in individual patients. Current computer-based methods to predict the presence and severity of disease also cannot be used to screen for disease in individual patients. We will improve the ability of computer technology to support the practice of medicine by developing and testing computer-based imaging methods for diagnosing and predicting the presence of specific diseases in humans, specifically colonic polyps and kidney stones. The principal investigator and co-investigators will develop and test these methods based on their previous experience with computationally intensive image and video analysis methods. We will also develop general purpose algorithms for classifying objects based on their physiologically important properties. These methods are applicable to a wide range of medical problems, including analysis of cell structure and function, preoperative diagnosis of colon cancer, and screening for kidney stones.
