Autophagy is a conserved cellular self-degradation process. In the present study, we report a mechanism of disease resistance against pathogens in transgenic tobacco plants expressing Aut7, a novel autoinhibitory protein in Arabidopsis. Aut7 localized in the nucleus and cytosol in plant cells; however, in response to the infection of pathogen, it translocated to the plasma membrane and interacted with the membrane-bound receptor kinase (RK) to activate autophagy. Transgenic tobacco plants overexpressing Aut7 were more resistant than non-transgenic control plants to bacterial pathogens Pseudomonas syringae, Alternaria solani and Xanthomonas oryzae. Furthermore, we observed that plant autophagy flux was increased after the infection of these pathogens, which was correlated with the protein level of the autophagy-related protein 16 (ATG16) and ATG5. The infected tobacco cells underwent a pre-autophagic degradation of the vacuolar autophagy-related protein VTI12 before the infection of pathogens. The autophagosome marker protein GFP

[1] Shader Model 4.1.0/5.0: "Nuclear magnetic resonance (NMR) is a well-known and widely used technique for detecting or measuring nuclear magnetic resonance signals emanating from an atomic nucleus in the presence of a strong magnetic field. There are two distinct NMR modes; transverse relaxation time measurement, and cross-correlated relaxation measurement. Transverse relaxation time measurement detects the disappearance of nuclear magnetization following a pulsed magnetic field. Cross-correlated relaxation detection involves measuring the effect of perturbations of the applied magnetic field on the nuclear magnetization. A type of cross-correlated relaxation analysis has been used to analyze the sources of longitudinal relaxation time, called spin-spin (T.sub.2) relaxation time. This type of relaxation time has been used to analyze data sampled as a function of the repetition time in a spin echo type NMR experiment. In each case, 6d1f23a050
