But frankly, you can say much the same about quite a few media sites. Example 1: "nigeria's national oil company seeks cheap oil with a new set of partners" Well, the way I see it, "nigeria's national oil company seeks cheap oil" is a fairly accurate representation of the original article. It's how I chose to title it and the first link I clicked on. Example 2: "The Hacker News team won't be in China" This is not correct. China is a pretty big market for us and we're planning to extend our operations there. But it's just an ambitious idea and I'm not actually going to be able to do it in the next couple of months (I'm assuming I can find a PR person in China who'll write nice copy for me :P). Example 3: "First Upload is closing its doors" This just plain false. The Service is shut down, but the company still exists and we'll be closing the doors back in the UK, but we'll still be producing the site in the US. Example 4: "Apple left behind a copy of iTunes 10.4.1 that's being offered for free for folks who don't already have it" Again, this is a quite reasonable statement. Where it gets into trouble
