For my “in the trenches” review, I spent serious time with new features in the face-detection software. I also revisit the main features. How does this software compare to other face-detection tools? What are the Pros and Cons? Let’s dive in. I spent countless hours working with the new PhotoFiltre feature, which allows fine tuning at 64 shades of gray to define a brush. PhotoFiltre will take a photo of a brush to create a custom filter. This new filter will apply these details to the image, but only as a low-resolution filter. You can save the results, and share the collection of custom filters to Photoshop. At best, PhotoFiltre can save you a lot of time and should be in every photographer’s toolkit. At worst, it will only offer some shallow effects all of us have seen in the past. Since the last review of Elements, at least two new features have been added to the product: Face Tracking and PhotoPanorama. Face Tracking is a feature that automatically detects faces and their location in a photo. It auto corrects the rotation of photos, especially those uploaded and shared on a mobile device. It even does a good job of naming the people in photos. PhotoPanorama works with photos that include multiple people. It automatically detects faces and attaches them into a panoramic image. So Adobe’s AI has taken the Elements photo editor to new levels. It makes sense, as the AI is used to analyze images. The Power of AI is the reason its Edge Generators work so well. I find myself a bit frustrated that the interface for this application is so small. The interface just doesn’t seem to pull together for me. I can’t imagine how someone unfamiliar with Microsoft’s interface would find it. It seems like a good demo of AI to me.
