Tetrahymena is a biological model organism for studying gene regulation, gene expression, and post-transcriptional and post-translational processes. Tetrahymena gene expression and its regulation has been under study since 1974 (Maniatis et al., 1975). T. thermophila is a ciliated protozoan that is commonly found in the intestinal tract of crustaceans, birds, and fish. The development of T. thermophila is well characterized (Nowakowski et al., 2006). In T. thermophila, the gametes are the conjugating pair, which was first described by N. P. White in 1951 (White, N. P., 1951). It has been reported that each conjugating pair produces two resistant progeny cells (Nowakowski et al., 2006). Many species of ciliates are flagellated and swim through the water. However, T. thermophila is a swarmer, which means that it does not move and swim through
