I do think that added support for Adaptive and Smart previews helps to increase overall image quality. While it's true, these features, while often helpful, are not quite as "smart" as they are reported to be. Instead, they alter the way you view and manipulate images based on the way you work on them. For example, if you have photos with a defined white balance that are being previewed with a result that fails to match the settings you actually selected, the preview could become quite unsatisfying. Similar adjustments could be effecting other layers as well. As a result, I would suggest that you don't rely too much on these previews as they can often introduce more trouble than they're worth. Or for that matter, simply don't use Adaptive or Smart previews. Adobe Photoshop is in a realistic mode. On a device, you can easily pull a task from your Mac or PC and perform it on a device. It's a very mobile application. Using the USB accessory, the iPhone or iPad actually becomes a lot closer to a high-end device. Backing up a database with smart previews is no more difficult than backing up. The catalog is compatible with every operating system, since it has a 32-bit version. Most operating systems provide an easy way to back up a work project. Thus, we do not have to lock the database's sensitive information in the cloud. This is an advantage over Lightroom, which is based on the unreliable iCloud. The database works on Windows, Mac OS, and Linux.
